Lower Mortgage Rates, More Listings: A Brighter Future for NYC Real Estate

As we wrap up the year with our final quarterly report, the winds of change are blowing through the New York housing market. With both inflation and labor cooling off, the Federal Reserve has begun a cycle of interest-rate cuts that are expected to continue through next year, reversing the trend that has constrained our real estate market since 2022. As mortgage rates dip and new listings start to rise, a StreetEasy analysis has declared that "the worst times are behind us for NYC home buyers."

Looking Ahead

What can we expect for the rest of the year and into 2025? While we are not in the predictions business (our crystal ball is in the shop), and truly anything can happen, we're on track for a gradual return to a healthier housing market barring any unforeseen events. This means more options for first-time buyers and anyone looking to upgrade, right-size, or get a change of scenery. Even for cash buyers who are less sensitive to rates, this is a welcome development.

Your Real Estate Journey

As always, your real estate decisions are deeply personal and go beyond just numbers. When you have questions or feel ready to make a move, we're here to help you make thoughtful choices that are strategic for your finances and empowering for your desired lifestyle. Reach out and let's schedule a private consultation to discuss your unique situation and goals.
